How to talk about "death" without triggering the person "Death means release." - Theodore Roethke My friend Keith, who is in recovery, is dead. When someone in recovery dies, two things happen: people stop sharing their negative recovery stories and they stop sharing their negative recovery statistics with people who may still be in denial about themselves and their situation. They tell me about a particular time they overdosed or they were at the G-8 House and finally had to face the fact that their addiction had been holding them hostage for years. When Keith died, I found myself writing obituaries for him on the recovery blogs, and then I wrote a few things about him in my own blog. Over the next few days, I heard from several people telling me about his positive recovery. So much so, in fact, that I considered putting up the obits. That would have been a lie: I didn't want the posts to be lies. I just wanted to get over my own grief and make room for the grief and the love and the memories that Keith had brought to so many lives. And then, one day, the posts on the blogs began to slow down. In the past, when I've written about death, I've always had a personal angle to it. I've enjoyed writing about how the people I know are doing in the face of death because I've known people who have experienced death in their own way. But writing about death in a "let's talk about death" way that doesn't make anyone vulnerable just didn't seem right.
