The Mac's native scripting language is limited by a lot of things that the programmer can not control, including document type, open applications, and system response. These limitations cause some problems, especially with large documents such as presentations and spreadsheets. But with a bit of editing and creativity, an AppleScript programmer can write a script that will automate any action needed in a document, and usually only one time. There is a great number of scripting languages available for use on the Macintosh. In the beginning, I have chosen AppleScript for this application because it is easy to understand, has a friendly learning curve, and it integrates nicely with a lot of applications. With all of the scripting languages available, I decided to make my application fairly easy to learn and use. I did this by choosing to use a scripting language that is easy to understand, with a friendly learning curve 81e310abfb
