HyperMotion Technology™ Recap The technology was originally developed and tuned during the years of development of FIFA 20 for the current-gen consoles and the next-gen consoles. In order for the technology to meet the requirements for current-gen and next-gen, the developers first performed an iterative process during development to explore how the technology would work in a video game environment that did not natively support motion capture. The original concept was then re-tuned based on the feedback they received, improved and retested for the next iteration of the technology. In football, there are many different types of collisions that happen all day during a game. Players colliding with one another, players hitting the ground, players going through the air, players diving and tackling, players recovering from tackles, players with dekes, players reversing the ball, etc. While all of these actions are important to understanding a game of football, how the technology was designed helps make sense of a lot of these actions, such as player-to-player collisions, player-to-ground collisions, player recoveries, and player's hits off of the ball. Collisions in FIFA 22 are physics-based. There are several collision rules to take into account if a collision with another player is to be detected. For example, if a player runs into a player at high speed with the ball, that collision will be detected only if the ball contacts that player. Therefore, players with the ball at the moment of contact are always detected. If a player is completely encircling a player with the ball, that player will be detected. In cases where there is a player that is behind a player with the ball and is working to get the ball, that player will only be detected after that player collides with another player. For example, if a player with the ball is working to pass the ball forward and another player is working to get a piece of the ball, then only when that player and player with the ball collide will the player working to get the ball be detected as the second player. Players, other than the ball, are also detected. If a player touches the ball, is in the air, or is on the ground, they will always be detected. Players with the ball, no matter where they are going with the ball, are always detected. A player changing direction with the ball, however, may or may not be detected. The technology that makes up HyperMotion Technology is primarily focused on
